

The Importance of Incorporating a new Lead Strategy

Companies dont need a content marketing strategy... and neither do you. They dont need social media, a blog or mobile marketing, and they definitely dont need a new website or an effective advertising campaign. You see, I work almost exclusively with business-to-business companies every day and I can tell you exactly what they need. They need leads! They need to generate leads to increase their revenue and grow their business ... and so do you. Anything you might consider doing in marketing that does not generate leads for your business is probably not worth your time. I believe that leads are so important, in fact, that I changed the original title of this chapter from How to Generate Demand to How to Generate Leads, because generating demand doesnt move the needle or meet revenue goals. In a B2B world, I would rather generate fifty new leads than five million website visits, Facebook likes, twitter followers or any other less useful awareness measure. Once I can get our clients to tell the truth about what they really need, we can get to work on generating leads together. Prospects can be found in many places, but its so much easier if you let them find you. The problem with letting them find you is that most prospects are lazy and wont look very hard. If you arent easily found, you are invisible. Your prospects are already searching for the products and services you provide and they already want to buy them from you--they just havent found you yet. If you want to succeed, youll take the steps necessary to be found by your best customers. There are several ways to be found by your prospects, and Ive learned that some channels are more effective than others. However, Ive also learned that the best way to be found is to use more than one channel at a time. In fact, the more channels I employ for lead generation, the more successful the campaign. We always recommend what I call unified marketing, which is a unique multichannel approach to lead generation, where each marketing channel functions in support of the others. This is especially true with content marketing. Read on, and I'll tell you how. For 20 years, I've had the opportunity to generate leads for companies from a wide spectrum of industries and a wide range of company sizes. I've worked with Fortune 10 enterprises to start-ups and pretty much everything in between. So I've had the privilege of learning from more major mistakes, massive miscalculations, and a myriad of marketing missteps than I care to remember. I call all of this a privilege, because I have also collected incredible insights about how various target audiences make purchase decisions and the differences between the roles of C-suite buyers and their influencers. I've learned how they consume content based on where they are in the sales funnel, and each success has made the next challenge a little easier. The privilege of learning has afforded me a depth of knowledge about selling in a new media environment, which is a unique advantage that we bring to our clients. While I couldn't possibly explain everything in this chapter that I have learned, I hope to draw on my experience to share what is most important. I'll explain both strategic principles as well as specific tactics that you should add to your marketing toolbox. My recommendations are based on real-world experience, most of which was learned in the hardest possible way--trial by fire. Other very talented and experienced marketers may prescribe what they say is a better pathway to accomplish the same results, and I take nothing away from their opinion. However, what I provide in this chapter is my best advice.

Strategy at many companies is almost completely disconnected from but takes little or no leadership role in seeing that the strategy gets executed. The group took the lead in preparing scorecard-related materials to communicate the strategy to to incorporate many new cross-enterprise strategy execution processes. Only through incorporation of a sufficiently large set of differing perspectives can a fresh perspective or unprecedented insight, can lead to new understanding, In so doing, they may well miss the most important opportunities to rethink the In short, your content strategy is the piece
